NATURE NOTES 64

Brian Davis

Drowned in yonder living blue/ The lark becomes a sightless song. When my grandfather came to England from Boston, USA, in 1937, he went out for a walk and came back saying that he had seen skylarks but they weren't singing. Of course, if you see a skylark in the sky that is precisely what they are doing. But I understand his problem as I'm afraid it's rather like that with me these days, and Beth always hears the first spring warbler to arrive. Unfortunately, fewer and fewer people do hear skylarks nowadays as they have been declining over most of England and Wales, mainly because of winter-sown cereals in the east and the change to intensive silage-making in the west. The Entry Level Stewardship scheme, administered by Natural England and the Environment Agency, is now helping to reverse this trend through grants for 'skylark plots' in cereal fields, as I saw last autumn in the RSPB farm at Knapwell. These are just unsown patches about 4 metres square and two per hectare, but they make all the difference. Skylarks can raise two to three broods a year by feeding their chicks on beetles and other insects in these patches, so in just five years the numbers of skylarks there have increased dramatically. Actually, the Burtons have achieved great success with Skylarks and Lapwings through having fallow fields in their Higher Level Scheme. Several skylarks were singing in early February over their fields near Stocking Barn. Perhaps we could have another farm walk this year to see what they have achieved.
